An Open Letter to the Mayor and Members of Calgary City Council

Dear Mayor and Councillors,

On behalf of the union representing City of Calgary employees, I am writing to express our deep concern regarding the proposed Administrative Restructuring Bylaw (ARB) that is scheduled for second reading on February 3, 2026, during a meeting of the Executive Committee. While we support transparency and accountability in public institutions, this proposal raises significant questions about how it will affect the people who keep this city running—and the services Calgarians rely on. We're members of our ability to consult and retain valued employees.

It is important to note that Council has already taken meaningful steps toward compensation transparency. In 2024, City Council approved a full compensation disclosure list that is published annually. This report provides comprehensive information about compensation across the organization, including salary ranges, total compensation, and the number of employees identified by bands. The existing model strikes a responsible balance between transparency and the safety and dignity of employees. The new proposal, however, moves beyond that balance and creates risks that could unnecessarily harm without offering any additional public value.

The motion as drafted puts serious risks to employee privacy. Publicly disclosing individual employee names, positions, and salaries—even with delayed timing—creates a permanent, searchable information, and private citizens. Many employees have no choice in their public exposure, and particularly changed environments. Making their compensation identifiable, directly or indirectly, could expose them to harassment, discrimination, or even threats to their workplace.

Furthermore, the proposed bylaw would require the disclosure of the salaries of all employees who perform duties of a confidential nature, including those in legal services, human resources, police officers, senior executives, and frontline workers. Transparency legislation in other jurisdictions typically limits disclosure to senior leadership roles, precisely because broader disclosure can have significant unintended consequences. Publicly naming compensation also outside of this context invites misinterpretation and fuels misinformation about the value of public-sector work. It also risks undermining equity and morale for those who have been historically paid less for equivalent work.

Finally, we are concerned that the Notice of Motion was brought forward without meaningful consultation with the employees and unions affected by this bylaw. The City's Respectful Workplace Policy and Code of Conduct exist specifically to protect those who contribute to the daily functioning of the workforce. We urge Council to pause this process and engage in proper dialogue before considering any changes to this framework.

For these reasons, we respectfully request that the Council reject the Employee Compensation Disclosure Bylaw. Calgary's current model is already among the most transparent in Canada and Alberta, and respects for the collective bargaining process. Any changes to this model should be made only after meaningful consultation with affected employees and their representatives, and only if they can be shown to improve public accountability without creating unnecessary risks.

Thank you for your attention to this matter. We welcome the opportunity to discuss these concerns further.

What the Employee Survey Really Tells Us – and Why It Matters

The City of Calgary's latest employee survey offers an important snapshot of how workers are feeling – not just about their day-to-day work, but about the systems, supports, and leadership that shape it. The results are mixed, and that's exactly why they matter. Overall, most staff say they're proud to work for the City, value the work it does, and take pride in delivering services to Calgarians. But a reminder of the work needed to ensure every City employee is respected, supported, and valued.

The results show what many of us already know: City workers are deeply committed to serving their communities. That dedication is a real strength, and it's reflected in high engagement scores and a willingness to keep doing this running. That dedication is the backbone of public services, and it deserves to be recognized.

At the same time, the survey highlights areas where the City must do better. Concerns about workload, staffing levels, communication, and psychological safety continue to surface year after year. Workers are being asked to do more with less, and many feel that their voices aren't being heard. That's a problem. It's a problem for employees and it's a problem that impacts service delivery.

From the union's standpoint, these results reinforce what we've been asking at the bargaining table and through ongoing labour-management discussions:

- Chronic understaffing is taking a toll. When vacancies go unfilled or departments are expected to "do more with less," burnout is the result – and it's predictable.
- Respectful workplaces must be a priority. Every employee deserves a safe, inclusive environment free from harassment, discrimination, and bullying.
- Communication needs to improve. Workers want transparency, clarity, and genuine engagement, not top-down directives that ignore frontline realities.
- Well-being cannot be an afterthought. Mental health, workload balance, and psychological safety are essential to a healthy workplace, not optional add-ons.

The survey results are not a criticism of employees. They are a call to action for the employer. Listening is only the first step. What matters now is how the City responds.

As your union, we will continue to push for concrete improvements, not just promises. We will use this data to strengthen our advocacy, support members who are struggling, and hold the employer accountable for creating the conditions where workers can thrive. When employees are supported, Calgarians benefit – through better services, more stability, and a stronger city as a whole.

City workers keep Calgary moving. You deserve workplaces that recognize your expertise, support your well-being, and treat you with the respect you've earned. We're here to help make that a reality.

The survey has spoken. Now it's time for the City to act – and your union will be there every step of the way to ensure that happens.

Why a ZeroBased Budget Review is a Bad Idea for Calgary Municipal Workers

Calgary's municipal workers know better than most how much it takes to keep a city running. And they, thousands of CUPE workers, know how much the services that we provide, safe, and resilient. That's why proposals for a ZeroBased budget review (ZBR) should raise serious concerns for residents, and should make residents across the city ask some hard questions.

ZBR may sound like a tidy, business school solution, but in practice it's a costly, disruptive, and unnecessary exercise that has failed governments at every level, and the people who deliver them – all the time.

What ZeroBased Budgeting Actually Means

A ZBR review requires every department to rebuild its entire budget from scratch, line by line, every cycle. Instead of planning based on last year's results and historical data, everything must be justified as if the program or service never existed before.

On paper, that might look like "efficiency." In reality, it creates instability, delays, and pressure to cut corners.

Why It's a Bad Fit for a Complex City Like Calgary

1. It rivals essential services like optional utilities

Snow clearing, water treatment, transit operations, emergency response, parks maintenance – these aren't discretionary. They're the baseline conditions that make Calgary livable, safe, and functional. They're also services that Calgarians have come to expect and rely on. Treating them like optional programs that must constantly justify their existence invites service cuts, opening the door to arbitrary cuts and political interference.

2. It drains time and resources away from delivering services

A full ZBR process can take thousands of staff hours, pulling subject-matter experts away from the work they're supposed to do. Every hour spent rebuilding a budget is an hour not spent delivering. Staff is pressured instead of public service only makes things worse.

3. It favors the voices of long-term residents and wealthier neighborhoods

Cities operate on multiyear cycles. You can't rebuild a water plant, maintain a transit fleet, or plan for population growth on a budget that resets to zero every year. ZBR undermines the long-term planning that keeps Calgary's infrastructure safe and reliable.

4. It's expensive, and the savings are overstated

Jurisdictions that have tried ZBR often abandoned it because the administrative cost outweighed any theoretical savings. Calgary has already been through multiple budgeting cycles. There's no evidence that another round of "start from zero" reviews will uncover anything new.

What Calgary Actually Needs

Instead of disruptive budget experiments, Calgary needs:

- Stable, predictable funding for essential services
- Evidence-based planning grounded in real operational needs
- Investment in frontline staff, not more layers of review
- Longterm strategies that support a growing, changing city

Municipal workers have already delivered reliable efficiencies over the past decade. The issue isn't waste – it's chronic underfunding and political pressure to do more with less.

Standing Up for Public Services

A ZBR review may be framed as "responsible fiscal management," but for municipal workers and the residents who rely on them, it's a risky backward. Calgary deserves a budgeting system that strengthens public services, not one that destabilizes them.

CUPE Local 38 members know what it takes to keep this city running. We need a budget process that respects that expertise, supports the workforce, and invests in the services Calgarians count on every day.

Family Day – Monday, February 16

Family Day has been a recognized statutory holiday in Alberta since 1990. It was introduced to give employees time to spend with their families and loved ones – very important for mental health and well-being. Many of us have busy lives and Family Day is a chance to slow down and can be draining. We encourage you to enjoy your day off, connecting with those closest to you!

Pink Shirt Day: Standing Together Against Bullying

Every February, people across Canada come together for Pink Shirt Day, a powerful reminder that bullying has no place in our schools, workplaces, or communities. The movement began in 2007 when Grade 12 students at a school in Nova Scotia took a stand after seeing a new student bullied for wearing a pink shirt. Their simple act of support has grown into an international movement for safe, inclusive communities. For unions, the message resonates deeply. Bullying doesn't only happen in schools – it can also happen in the workplace and online.

Pink Shirt Day traces its origins to 2007, when two students organized a show of support for a classmate who had been bullied for wearing a pink shirt to school. They – encouraging others to wear pink in solidarity – sparked a wave of compassion that continues to inspire millions. Today, Pink Shirt Day is recognized in schools, workplaces, and communities across Canada and the world, whether in person or virtually, workplaces, or off. Learn more at pinkshirtday.ca.

For CUPE members and all workers, bullying is not just a social issue. It's a labour issue. Workplace bullying can take many forms, including verbal abuse, exclusion, intimidation, and discrimination against workers based on race, Indigenous identity, gender, or targeted. It affects their health, their families, and their ability to participate fully in their workplaces and communities. Unions have long been at the forefront of fighting for safe workplaces, and our collective agreements and workplace policies are powerful tools for addressing bullying.

This year's Pink Shirt Day theme emphasizes lifting each other up – a message that aligns perfectly with the values of the labour movement. Lifting each other up means calling out harmful behaviour, supporting colleagues who are struggling, and fostering workplaces where everyone feels safe to speak up. It means recognizing that bullying often thrives in environments of disempowerment, where marginalized groups, and contributing workers to equity and inclusion in everything we do.

On Pink Shirt Day, February 25, we encourage all members to wear pink, participate in awareness activities, and take a moment to reflect on how each of us can contribute to safer, more respectful workplaces. CUPE 38 will be sharing resources and hosting discussions throughout the day, all elevating the campaign and fostering conversations about bullying, equity, and inclusion.

Together, we can build workplaces and communities where kindness is powerful, solidarity is visible, and bullying has no place. Let's lift each other up, today and every day.

International Women's Day: Celebrating Strength, Advancing Justice

Every year on March 8, International Women's Day invites us to reflect on the achievements of women, the barriers that remain, and the collective power we hold to build a more just and equitable world. For unions, and for the labour movement, this day is more than a celebration – it is a call to action.

Women have always been at the heart of our unions. They are frontline workers, organizers, stewards, activists, and leaders who have built and sustained the labour movement with courage and conviction. Their advocacy has shaped safer workplaces, fairer wages, stronger benefits, and more inclusive contracts. Yet despite this legacy, women – especially racialized women, Indigenous women, LGBTQ+ women, and women with disabilities – continue to face disproportionate barriers in the workplace and in their communities.

International Women's Day reminds us that gender equity is inseparable from workers' rights. Pay gaps persist. Care work remains undervalued. Harassment and discrimination continue to drive people out of jobs they love. When women are supported, unions are stronger. When women rise to the top, everyone wins. That is the power of solidarity in action.

But the story doesn't end there. Across the country, women are organizing, mobilizing, and leading transformative change. From bargaining health care and education, to fighting for reproductive justice, to demanding safer workplaces and stronger protections, women are showing what solidarity in action truly looks like.

This year's International Women's Day theme – 'Inspire Inclusion' – challenges all of us to build spaces where everyone can thrive. That means listening to the voices that are too often overlooked, creating opportunities for leadership, and ensuring that gains of some don't create exclusion and discrimination.

CUPE has a proud history of supporting women throughout our union. Grace Hartman holds a historic place in Canada's labour movement as the first woman to hold a major Canadian union, serving as president of the Canadian Union of Public Employees from 1968 to 1975. Her work through local, provincial, and national roles, becoming a key architect of CUPE after its formation in 1963. Hartman championed full collective bargaining rights for municipal and hospital workers, and helped establish the Canadian Labour Congress' Committee of Women. Her legacy reminds us that women's leadership has always been central to the labour movement, and that progress has been hard-won. Her story is a reminder that the fight for equity is long, and that it requires persistence, courage, and collective action.

Across the country, workers are leading efforts to dismantle systemic racism and build more inclusive workplaces. Unions are bargaining for anti-discrimination provisions, supporting equity-deserving members, addressing inequities in our own structures, and using our collective voice to push for policies that advance justice. It means standing firmly against hate in all its forms, whether it appears in our communities, our workplaces, or online.

As a union, we recommit to this work every day. We honour the workers who have led the way, and we stand with those who are still fighting for their rights. Because when we lift each other up, we create a movement where every member feels safe, valued, and empowered. Eliminating racism is not a one-day effort – it is a long-term commitment that strengthens our solidarity and builds a stronger future.

On March 21, and every day, let's stand together against racism and work toward a future where equity, justice, and human rights are not aspirations, but realities for all.

Stay Strong and See You Next Month!

Sincerely,

Your Executive Team
