Notice: No Union Meetings in July and August

City unions were notified at the end of May that the City of Calgary is suspending its long-standing Staff Provided Use of Resources (SPUR) agreement with unions. Included within the City's empty allotment states that "this action has been taken as a risk mitigation measure to ensure we are not providing any perceived preferential treatment."

Effective May 28th, all new applications will be rejected. Applications currently under review will be reviewed on a case-by-case basis, if needed. Only applications approved prior to May 28th will be permitted to proceed.

A reminder to all members that there will be no regularly scheduled union meetings during July and August. Meetings will resume in September. The union office will remain open during regular business hours, and members are encouraged to reach out should the need arise. We wish all members and their families a safe and enjoyable summer.

Calgarians Amass as Part of Province wide Protest in Opposition to UCP Policies

NOTE: This article was originally published in the Calgary Herald on May 29, 2026, written by Ellen Rosenblum. You can view the article online by clicking here.

Thousands gathered at Riley Park on Friday evening to voice their opposition against a flurry of UCP policies. The rally was organized by Alberta Federation of Labour president Lori Sigurdson and Calgary Labour Council president Jeff Rath.

As the sun beat down on the protesters, their anger grew louder, with many shouting in unison each speaker, who called out against a long list of policies the UCP government has enacted, such as the use of the notwithstanding clause against teachers and transgender students and recent health care changes.

Standing at the tail end of a cheering crowd was Evan Gregory, who, unprepared to mount a podium and address the crowd, was content to simply be a part of the throng. He took the opportunity to publicly express his disapproval of the province's recent policies.

"I just solemnly disagree with everything that the UCP is doing, and what they've done since they've been in office," he said. "I'm here to support my union, I'm here to support my friends and I'm here to support my family. I'm here to support my community. I'm here to support Alberta. It's a federalist, but like, nothing — none of her actions point towards that.

"I definitely don't want to leave Canada — I think it would be unequivocally detrimental to our economy."

He was also against recent health care policies some critics say have pushed Alberta closer to a two-tiered, profit-based model of health care that would deprive the most financially vulnerable citizens of adequate care.

"I think it's time we stand up and do something," he added. "I've had enough."

The protest was born out of an opposition to the UCP's recent policies, with the Alberta Federation of Labour and Calgary Labour Council leading the charge.

The Alberta Federation of Labour was clear in a general ethos, but later backed off due to the rapid reflections rising fractions with student-based organizations and the UCP itself.

As a result, they established regional committees and brought in more organizations to coordinate a province-wide protest. Sigurdson, president of Alberta Federation of Labour and former NDP leadership candidate.

Rath, the protest was observed to the gaze out of the notwithstanding clause, but quickly grew to encompass a flood of policies released by the government. Now the rally, as McInnes-Rath's president, is about "all of it."

"Starting with separation, but that's certainly not the only thing that is motivating thousands of Albertans to come out here today," he said. "It's a whole host of issues. It's the UCP's record, it's their overall approach to governance, it's their overall attitude."

The protest drew a diverse group of people whose causes found solace in their frustration with the government. Among the crowd was Jeff Callaway, a former Conservative candidate who has run for office in the centre-right provincial party and UCP's cancellation of the Green Line project. It took aim at the government that paved the way for international firms to start mining projects in the Rocky Mountains. Callaway, triggering a wave of celebration and cheers, pointed to the significance of the protest.

"Water is life, and therefore these mountains where water comes from are life, and they need to be protected on behalf of Albertans and for all of the wildlife that depends on them," he said. "These mountains are our lifeblood, and coal mining, logging, and overall degradation are sacrificing the watershed evident down the road.

But raising wasn't the only cause that garnered the attention. The last here is solidarity with the Palestinian people, with many protesters holding signs and chanting slogans that called for solidarity to the current government's direction of separation and attacks on immigrants and refugees, and the Palestinian people.

Not all protesters were those on the left.

Holding a banner was Naomi Hering, who has worked in oil and gas as well as the renewable energy sector. She said she was there to support the UCP's recent policies, like Premier Smith, who has repeatedly backed Alberta's fossil fuel industry and Alberta.

"I would like to see some more new developments, new technologies, just even an exploration of all that we can be, and we know we can be a world leader in so many different ways," she said, as she was also opposed to Alberta's transition on clean energy projects in 2023.

"We've been complaining, we don't have this, we don't have that, and I'm saying, why don't we be the best for certain Progressive Conservative governments in the past. "And in fact, I used to work at a hospital in a past career, and I'm a nurse, and I've been approved during the COVID time."

"What I've observed is that people who have more on grievance... they tend to be less fresh on those."

Canada's Looming Labour Squeeze

NOTE: This article was originally published in BNC Insights on May 26, 2026, written by Nathan Janzen and Zhong Xiang. You can read the article by clicking here.

Canada's labour force is going through a period of unprecedented structural change for more than a decade.

It's been well-telegraphed that our temporary and permanent resident arrivals from abroad will be pivoted down on a track to shrink the net pace of growth in the labour force by 2027 and 2028, and the federal government has already begun to implement the first steps in that direction.

We have noted this trend creates an unusual combination: Less job growth (even potentially negative) is needed to keep the unemployment rate from rising, and more job growth is needed for the unemployment rate drifting lower – i.e., Canada's "breakeven" employment rate has declined dramatically.

And we pointed out the growing fiscal cost of an aging population over time with a rising share of the population in retirement, and a declining share of the population in the prime-working-age base that will be consuming and paying public services.

What has received less attention is the extent to which Canada (like virtually all other advanced economies) relies on immigration to fill labour shortages.

Without immigration, Canada's population of potential younger workers (under age 30) would have been shrinking for the past 15 years, and the unemployment rate would be lower than 2% (current immigration restrictions are expected to push the unemployment rate back down to 5%). The temporary resident share of the population we approached, but it's not likely enough to fully offset that structural labour-supply headwind in the future.

That's a good thing for workers. It means pockets of labour market weakness – particularly among younger workers – will be relatively rare in the future.

But it also means the economy will have labour shortages with noticeably return once the unusually high level of unemployment is absorbed.

Businesses are a structural ongoing headwind to economic growth, as [1] 1.5% of the labour force – about 25,500 workers per month. That's nearly double two decades ago when businesses were losing about 1% per month.

This has long been expected as the large post-WWII baby boomer generation hit retirement age and left the workforce. That now has peaked, but it has not yet translated into a lower pace of labour force growth.

The youngest baby boomers will turn 65 in 2029 (!!) in 2030, so the current wave of retirements has further room to run.

Retirements tend to begin edging higher for workers over the age of 55, and peak between 65 and 69. But a significant share of the population works longer – for financial reasons, because they enjoy their work, or because they're in good health.

Population aging and resulting retirements have already reduced the labour force participation rate of the standard-to-work age [1] in the working-age population (i.e., those aged 15 and over) until June 1996 that the Government of Canada officially proclaimed National Aboriginal Day. The day was established to celebrate the contributions of First Nations, Métis and Inuit Indigenous identities and communities.

At its heart, National Indigenous Peoples Day is a celebration – of language, art, music, storytelling, medicine, governance and so much more. Indigenous Peoples Day is also a reminder of the ongoing work that must be done to address the legacy of colonialism and the harm it has caused. Pacific Northwest, Indigenous cultures are living, evolving, and thriving. That resilience has been passed down through generations, and it is our responsibility to honour that connection between ancestors and gifts, and celebrate the contributions Indigenous communities have placed enormous burdens on Indigenous communities. Acknowledging these realities is part of what makes days like Canada's Indigenous Peoples Day so important and powerful.

Indigenous workers are an important growing part of Canada's workforce – and of our economy. They are also a key part of the solution to Canada's ongoing labour and demographic and workplace discrimination. The Truth and Reconciliation Commission's Calls to Action speak directly to the role employers, governments, and institutions like unions must play in closing these gaps.

Many cities across Alberta and Canada hold free public events on or around June 21st – sometimes a single day, sometimes a week-long celebration. Check your local listings and calendars to attend a local event and learn more about your local territory. Read books by Indigenous authors, and watch films by Indigenous filmmakers. Take a look at the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's Calls to Action. Supporting Indigenous-owned businesses and artists is another way to celebrate Indigenous cultures and communities, and to help close the shameful labour market wage gap.

The labour movement was built on the belief that working people are stronger together – that solidarity across difference is not just a moral principle, but a practical necessity. Days like this are an opportunity to deepen that practice, to stand alongside Indigenous coworkers, neighbours, and community members, and to commit to the shared work of building a more just and equitable Canada.

Miegwetch, Hiy hiy, Marsee, Thank you.

Labour Day Food Drive – September 7, 2026

This Labour Day, the Calgary & District Labour Council (CDLC) is asking union members across the city to come together for a cause that hits close to home. On September 7th, the day we celebrate the contributions of workers, CDLC Food Bank Drive – and we want this to be our biggest yet.

The need is real and growing. Food bank use among Calgarians doubled during the pandemic, and then doubled again between 2023 and 2025. Our neighbours, our coworkers, and sometimes even our own members are struggling to put food on the table. As unionists, we understand better than most that a strong community starts with shared effort. And this is our opportunity to put that solidarity into action.

Donations will be divided between the Calgary Food Bank and the Veterans Association Food Bank, ensuring support reaches a broad cross-section of Calgarians in need.

Last year, thanks to the generosity of our labour partners, the CDLC donated an impressive 5,010 pounds of food to the Calgary Food Bank, along with more than $18,791 in food and financial donations. That's the equivalent of roughly 37,500 meals for families across the city. Moreno's Centre. Those are numbers to be proud of – and we're aiming to blow them out of the water this year.

There are several ways to get involved. Many unions are setting up collection sites in their workplaces in the days leading up to September 7th. Individuals can drop off at the CDLC office at 1004 Centre St NW between 8:30 a.m. and 4:30 p.m. Monday to Friday, or on the day itself at 10 a.m. at the Calgary Food Bank's main warehouse. Financial donations can be made at any time. The CDLC office will be open for donation drop-offs from 11 AM to 7 PM on August 25, 26, 27, 28, 31 and on September 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. and on September 7 from 8 a.m. to 12 p.m.

And here is a little extra incentive this year: any union or individual who donates food or money will be entered into a draw for a very special prize – the chance to throw out the First Pitch at Dinosaurs baseball game on September 12th at 10 a.m. All in the name of a good cause, of course.

Every can, every dollar, and every bag makes a difference. If you have questions or would like to organize a collection site at your workplace, please reach out to President Alexander Shotyk at 403-463-4181 or president@cdlc.ca.

Make the Most of Your Summer

Summer is here, and with it comes an opportunity that too many of us let slip by – the chance to truly step away, recharge, and spend time on the people and things that matter most. Your vacation time was negotiated and won for a reason. Use it.

The connection between rest and productivity is well established. Workers who take their full vacation entitlement return to work more engaged, more focused, and less likely to suffer from burnout that erodes both performance and well-being over time. Yet year after year, many Canadians leave vacation days on the table, whether because of workload pressure, fear of falling behind, or a sense that it isn't worth it. You are worth it. You have earned it, and you deserve to enjoy it.

This collective agreement exists, in part, to protect your right to time away from work. The vacation entitlements our union negotiated are not a perk or a privilege – they are a recognized part of your compensation package, and your employer has a responsibility to support you in using them. Talking over an absence with a supervisor in advance is a conversation you have every right to start.

Work-life balance looks different for everyone. For some, summer means a family road trip or a week at the lake. For others, it means catching up on sleep, tending a garden, or simply having a few uninterrupted days at home. There is no wrong way to spend your time off, as long as it is time spent in a way that genuinely restores you. Resist the pressure to fill every hour with productivity or obligation.

That last point is worth dwelling on. The boundaries between work and personal time have become increasingly blurred in recent years, particularly with the rise of remote work and the expectation of constant digital availability. Many workers feel pressure – spoken or unspoken – to remain reachable even when they are technically off the clock. Setting clear boundaries around your time off, and trusting that your colleagues and supervisors will respect them, is something we can all model for one another.

If you have vacation days remaining and have not yet made plans, now is the time. Talk to your supervisor, review your collective agreement, and take what is yours. You have earned it.

The labour movement has always understood that a good life is about more than a paycheque. It is about having the time and the freedom to actually live. This summer, we encourage every member to honour that principle – for yourself, for your family, and for the generations of workers who fought to make rest a right rather than a luxury.

Enjoy your summer. You deserve it.

Stay Strong and See You Next Month!

Sincerely,
